Location: CREI, Universitat Pompeu Fabra, Barcelona

Dates: 25–29 June 2007

Time: 9:00–11:00

This course presents an overview of recent developments in economic geography and urban economics. The course begins with a review of the relationship between trade, agglomeration, and regional inequalities. This is motivated with an overview of the evolution of regional inequalities in Europe, which are then analyzed in light of the so-called 'new economic geography'. The second topic covers the process by which cities are formed and the role in this process of local governments and of the housing supply. We then study, both theoretically and empirically, the reasons that make firms and people cluster in space, and the extent and consequences of this clustering. The final two topics look at the drivers and implications of urban diversity and specialization, and at the distribution of city sizes.
